Q-Modern lifestyles mean that many parents have little time for their children. As a result, many children suffer because they do not get as much attention from their parents as children did in the past.

-Do you agree or disagree?

Sample answer

People who say that today's parents pay less attention to their children than in the past often point to a brief era in the twentieth century when middle-class moms stayed at home to care for their children. These individuals are implying that women should not work in the modern world.

In most families in the past, both parents worked significantly longer hours than they do now. What has changed is that most countries now require their children to attend school in addition to working. As a result, kids may have less interaction with their parents in that regard.

Children nowadays come into touch with instructors as a result of obtaining an education, and teachers must inevitably explain why some of their pupils are failing. Teachers frequently tell anecdotes about parents who are too busy to care for their children. In addition, if their parents do not supervise their children, they are likely to perform poorly in school. Academic failure is, however, nothing new, even when one or both parents are there. Children will suffer if their parents neglect them.

Children, in my opinion, suffered more in the past when the entire family was forced to labour long hours to make ends meet. Children are now protected by the law. Furthermore, having access to school implies they have additional opportunities.
