

IELTS Writing TASK 2

Q-In many countries, very few young people read newspapers or follow the news on TV.
-What do you think are the causes of this?

What solutions can you suggest?

Sample answer

Many countries are becoming increasingly concerned that newspapers are not being read and that many young people are not watching television news. As a result, young people in these nations are unaware of local, national, and worldwide events and are even concerned about them.

Most newspapers and news programs are created for an adult audience and are not delivered, so appeals to teens are the primary reasons for this problem. Furthermore, because the language is highly complicated and the style and substance are typically fairly serious, few young people read newspapers. Finally, young people are particularly intrigued by new technology, such as computers, which explains their lack of interest in the news.

Specific techniques may be utilized to assist young people in staying informed about current events. The first is for news organizations to offer information in ways that are appealing to young people. The easiest method is to achieve this is to post news on websites geared for a younger readership. Another solution is to have schools participate in the publication of regular school newspapers. Local, national, and worldwide news events might be covered, but schools should also encourage students to participate in article creation and submissions. This publication may then be given to all students, resulting in more young people receiving it regularly.

By delivering information in ways that appeal to young people, the low number of young people reading-newspapers and watching the news on television may be boosted. The idea is to use the internet and have schools create their newspapers, in which students participate.
