

IELTS Writing Task 2

Q-Should, the international community do more to tackle the threat of global warming?

Answer

Most climate experts have long identified global warming as a significant issue. Consequently, governments all around the world have begun to take steps to solve the problem. However, because our understanding of the scope and nature of the problem is continuously evolving, attempts to combat global warming must be reevaluated regularly.

Recent data shows that certain climate change risk factors may have been exaggerated. For example, rather than the two meters formerly predicted, sea levels are now anticipated to increase by about one meter. This is because certain glaciers and ice sheets, such as those in the Arctic, appear to be decreasing while others, such as those in the Antarctic, appear to be increasing. Furthermore, the Gulf Stream is currently believed to be unlikely to evaporate. As a result, plans for flood barriers in coastal regions may be scaled back.

There is evidence, however, that some of the effects of climate change may have been underestimated. Drought is increasingly seen to pose a more significant threat to tropical forests. Hurricanes and typhoons might intensify. More exceptional measures, particularly in low places, should be made to safeguard vulnerable populations. Storm-prone locations may require re-designing buildings to withstand severe winds.

On the other hand, these suggestions deal with the symptoms of global warming rather than the source of the problem: greenhouse gas emissions. Whatever the scope and character of global warming's repercussions, they are all bad. There is still work to be done to minimize the use of fossil fuels. Emissions objectives should be established more stringently, and the use of alternative energy sources should be promoted. On the other hand, doing nothing to address the causes of global warming would be highly irresponsible.
