

IELTS WRITING TASK 2

Q-School teachers are more responsible for the social and intellectual development of students than parents. To what extent do you agree or disagree?

Educators frequently bear more significant responsibility for kids' cognitive and social development than parents. Teachers are well-trained to teach formal lessons. Thus I agree with this viewpoint. Apart from that, school is the most OK location for kids to socialize and meet new people.

It is common knowledge that parents play a critical part in their children's upbringing. Nonetheless, educating them at home does not always imply that they will have a bright future. As a result, children must be provided with formal education. This is where the role of the schoolteacher comes into play. Aside from offering a pleasant learning environment, most institutions ensure that their staff members are up to speed on current teaching approaches through seminars and training. This method has long been used to ensure that pupils are prepared to deal with technological advances. Furthermore, practical exercises and laboratory experiments considerably improve problem-solving, logical thinking, and reasoning abilities.

In terms of the social element, children learn to engage with their classmates in school. Aside from their regular classroom contacts, they can participate in various extracurricular activities based on their interests. Scouting, sporting activities, and other organizations are just a few examples. These activities help develop leadership, camaraderie, and teamwork characteristics that are difficult to learn at home. As a result, it's not surprising that schools are where the majority of friendships begin.

In general, mentors play a more critical role than parents in developing a child's overall academic and social abilities. But, again, it's because they've been adequately trained to do so.
