MODEL ANSWER

Teleworking has become much more practical in recent years due to the rapid advancement of information and communication technology. Although office workers can be made geographically independent in many cases by using modems, faxes, and cell phones, few companies or employees take full advantage of this opportunity.

There are several compelling arguments for allowing employees to work from home. Employers' costs would be reduced for starters because businesses would require less office space, frequently located in the heart of large cities. Second, the lives of workers would be improved in various ways. For example, they would not have to travel to work, giving them more free time.

They could also combine their work and family lives, which is a significant advantage if they have young children or older adults to care for. Traveling to a centralized workplace, on the other hand, has several advantages. The first is that many employees would miss the social aspects of their jobs, such as seeing coworkers and meeting customers. Another issue is that employers must trust their employees to work to a high standard and complete their tasks on time. Finally, supervising teleworkers is more complex than managing employees in the same office.

Finally, working from home may inhibit teamwork and creative work, and it may be best suited to people who do routine office work.

To summarise, I believe that while many workers welcome the opportunity to go to work, others would find the opportunity to work from home very convenient. As a result, I believe that workers should be given the option, but not forced, to work from home if they so desire.
