

IELTS Writing task 2

Q-As the number of private cars has increased, so too has the pollution level in many cities. So what can-be done to tackle this increasingly common problem?

Sample answer

As the number of personal automobiles has grown, so has pollution. Overreliance on cars at the cost of public transportation has exacerbated the situation, prompting many concerned individuals to seek a solution.

One possible approach is to increase taxes on private automobiles to discourage their use. Many individuals would contemplate utilizing alternate modes of transportation or even walking if the price of gasoline were to rise. There might be a few complaints from automobile drivers, but they would be minor compared to the environmental advantages.

Another option is to investigate the problem's precise causes. Modern automobiles, for example, have cleaner-burning engines and catalytic converters. Consequently, they do not pose as much environmental risk as confident earlier automobiles. Automobiles that have been on the road for three years or longer in Japan, for example, are severely taxed, pushing people to buy new cars that pollute less. Some of the most polluting vehicles would be removed off the road if older vehicles were highly taxed. This, however, would not be fair to people who cannot afford to buy a new automobile regularly.

Improvements in public transportation's quality and efficiency would also encourage people to drive less. For example, in London, a system where people are assigned days of the week to use their vehicles has been in place for some years. On days when they are not permitted to drive, they use public transportation.

Although these are all possible answers to the problem, none of them are ideal. This issue can only be remedied with a concerted effort from both the government and the general population.
