

IELTS WRITING TASK 2

Q-People who have original ideas are of much greater value to society than those who can copy the opinions of others well.

-To what extent do you agree or disagree with this statement?

-Use your ideas, knowledge, and experience to support your arguments with examples and relevant evidence.

Model answer:

I certainly agree that people who come up with new ideas, or 'invent' or 'discover' things, are essential to society. However, I believe that good imitators have a place in society.

No one can deny that critical individuals must be recognized for providing us with facilities that we rely on daily. Where would we be, for example, if we didn't have essential items like the washing machine, television, and, more recently, computers? Yet, these items are now so every day that we take them for granted.

Today's society has become increasingly consumer-oriented. While it is possible to update and improve consumer goods constantly, the prices of these innovations are out of reach for many people I live with. Furthermore, not everyone lives in an area where the most recent models are available. As a result, there is a monetary value placed on providing good copies of expensive items.

Specific innovations have a more significant impact on our lives than consumer goods and are more challenging to replicate. For example, people worked tirelessly to develop vital medicines such as penicillin and vaccines against dangerous diseases. These scientific ideas allow us to live longer and avoid illness.
