Model answer:

People learn throughout their lives. Curiosity has always been regarded as an essential characteristic of a human being. We are always looking for new ways to push ourselves and learn more. Some people believe that children should begin formal education at a young age and devote most of their time to schoolwork. This will aid them in their future endeavors. However, I believe that children should not begin school at a young age for various reasons, further discussed below.

Of course, children who begin studying at a young age have a better chance of succeeding in the future. This is since they gain more knowledge and experience, both priceless and valuable. Furthermore, studying more now will allow them to perfect their expertise and become better professionals in the future.

However, I believe that every child is entitled to a childhood. Children should learn by playing and interacting with their peers and parents. I think that kindness, self-confidence, and a good sense of humor cannot be acquired through academic study. Children should spend more time with their families, playing and learning alongside their parents. Consider a child who, instead of playing with his friends, does his homework and is exhausted as a result. Another important aspect of this is that children at a young age require more exercise because physical development is critical. First and foremost, children must be healthy.

To summarise, children should have an unstructured childhood with no responsibilities. However, I am confident that playing helps them develop their bones and muscles and their ability to make decisions, analyze situations, and draw conclusions, all beneficial to their future.
